The new crop, rotate and transform tools seem to work just fine. One usability enhancement that I really like is a crisper grid when resizing. You can still use the ancient “Grayscale” interface if you’re tired of crisp. That option is still there for those who want to disable it. There are still a couple of aspects of Elements that I find sub-optimal. While the Crop tool is a welcome addition, I’d like to have the controls collapse when scrolling. In my recent review of Elements 2019, I compared it to VidGrade. VidGrade has an excellent grid that zooms in and out of any area you specify without getting too disoriented. Other than that, the new annotation feature is fantastic. Annotation is in real time! This feature allows you to comment on a PSD file directly with Photoshop. I was expecting over 100 features there and for now they've only updated the annotation feature. Adobe Photoshop and Lightroom are very complementary. Adobe Photoshop has upgraded a lot of Lightroom functionality. And Lightroom is working on acquiring import templates. We thought it would be interesting to look at what they accomplish with each other.

Lightroom Lite and Lightroom Pro won't be able to import templates, nor will they update until a few months after Photoshop. This is the biggest deal breaker for me. I have nearly two thousand experimental templates imported into Lightroom and that import takes forever. I also have an entire library of textures imported, which Lightroom Lite or Pro can't do. If I had to pick one I would strongly go with Photoshop.
